At UCL, we support a rare breadth and depth of knowledge and expertise drawn from world-leading research. We can be proud of our engagement with public policy: approximately 30% of our impact case studies submitted to the Research Excellence

UCL is rightly proud of the radical tradition – a commitment to innovation, accessibility and relevance – that was established by our founders. Successive generations have sought to impact on society and challenge conventional thinking

The following are the Core Aims of the UCL Public Policy Strategy.

Build on UCL's capacity for public policy engagement

UCL Public Policy raises awareness of opportunities for research to inform policy (and the value of doing so) and encourages a willingness to engage with public policy and policymakers. We work with UCL faculties and departments to build on our capacity for public policy engagement, and with other units to capture the impacts arising from that engagement. Through the provision of advice and support to UCL researchers with an interest in policy engagement, we will expand UCL's capacity and appetite.

We continue to develop our external networks and partners to enhance our activities and to better understand where we can most add value in the public policy sphere.

Promote a coordinated approach to our wide range of public policy-focused activities

UCL Public Policy develops synergies between other UCL initiatives to maximise learning between departmental, faculty and school activities. To enable this we stimulate and add value to specific projects and initiatives by sharing best practice and providing additional support where appropriate. UCL Public Policy has an important role in coordinating and communicating opportunities for UCL researchers to engage with policy (for example, through secondments and calls for evidence) and in facilitating additional routes for researchers to interact with policymakers.

We aim to minimise the risk of conflicting approaches from UCL agents to external bodies through consultative stakeholder relationship management.

Integrate expertise and knowledge from across disciplines to inform policy

The institution-wide perspective of the Office of the Vice-Provost (Research) enables UCL Public Policy to bring together senior UCL academics to anticipate and respond to government, parliamentary and civil service needs for policy evidence. UCL Public Policy identifies key policy issues to which UCL can make a contribution and coordinates such contributions, including exploiting insights emerging from UCL Grand Challenges activity. We emphasise the value of our breadth and depth of expertise to policymakers by offering access to a range of knowledge relevant to complex issues and deploying our considerable convening power.

Support the effective communication of research with policy relevance to external stakeholders, highlighting the policy implications of UCL research

UCL Public Policy works with researchers to identify and access public policy-relevant research, highlighting the range of UCL policy initiatives and outcomes. We ensure that these are effectively communicated to policymakers and promote these externally through a range of mechanisms, including meetings, written briefings and submissions

UCL Public Policy Priority Activities

Establish UCL as a hub for dialogue and debate on public policy and develop UCL's reputation as a source of high-quality policy-relevant research

UCL Public Policy provides an interface between academics and policymakers and offers a forum for discussion and interaction.

Through expanding our networks of researchers and our contacts in the public policy community, we promote and facilitate new routes for engagement and interaction between researchers and policymakers. We also facilitate new strategic partnerships with external organisations, and build on existing relationships, to expand our public policy activity.

We are responsive to both the external policy landscape and internal developments. To support this we prioritise a number of Priority Activities that we consider will best deliver our strategic aims:
